So even if some kings were more powerful than others, that power extended over a relatively small amount of territory. There were a number of factors that seriously limited the power of kings in Medieval Europe. First, roads and other forms of communication were very poor, and that limited the ability to administer a strong, centralized state. Second, if you’re going to have a strong, centralized state, you need a strong, centralized army (to put down those rebellious barons, for instance). To do that, you need to be able to feed that army (difficult, because agricultural yields weren’t that h
