I had already had four children - aged between two and 10 at the time - and when I realised I was pregnant again, I knew almost instantly that I didn't want to go ahead. My husband and I had felt so happy during my earlier pregnancies, but when we discussed this one, both of us were thinking the same thing: what on earth are we going to do? You see those stories in soap operas all the time and I understand why. It makes for good drama. It is really important for people to hear from women who have had abortions and who really feel fine about it though. Adults can’t live their children’s lives for them. Our task is to help them grow and gain their own experience, and it’s important not to overdo it. Many parents try to become friends with their children, and they don’t want their kids to have any secrets from them. We can easily understand why parents want this, but let’s try to look at this a little deeper. What is a friend? Many children will share such personal things with their parents if they feel safe. What to do? Instead of interrogating your child, let them have their own private space. Personal stories that matter. Sign up now to get NYT Parenting in your inbox every week.

According to time-use data analyzed by Melissa A. Milkie, a sociologist at the University of Toronto, today’s working mothers spend as much time doing hands-on activities with their children as stay-at-home mothers did in the 1970s. Texting and social media have allowed parents to keep ever closer track of their progeny.
